

Passion for a Cause—Mt. Kilimanjaro Ascent

Climb to Fund Education of Poverty-Stricken Girls in Tanzania

"To know even one life has breathed easier because you have lived—that is to have succeeded."

—Ralph Waldo Emerson

At Ingage, not only are we passionate about our work, life, and making a visceral difference for our clients—we are passionate about making a difference in the world. This year we have chosen to sponsor a program with Nurturing Minds to support The Segha Girls School, in Morogoro, Tanzania.

Nurturing Minds is a US based non-profit organization that supports quality education for Tanzanian girls who otherwise would not attend school due to extreme poverty.

Ingage partner, Karen Davis and her 15 year-old son will travel to Tanzania in August to climb one of the World's Seven Summits, Mt. Kilimanjaro (19,340 feet) in an effort to raise awareness and funds for The Segha Girls School.

The goal between now and the end of the year is to help raise $150,000 for a permanent facility where girls can learn in an environment void of hunger or the fear of being abused. By breaking out of these historical cycles, these young women will gain the necessary tools and confidence to further their education and eventually fill leadership roles at all levels of society.

Per Goldman Sachs' Dina Habib Powell's CNN.com commentary on Educate a Woman, Create a Nation "...a 1 percentage point increase in female education raises the average level of gross domestic product by .37 and raises annual GDP growth rates by .2 on average."

We are very excited about this opportunity because 100% of all funds raised will go towards construction of the school building.
